SYMPOSIUM CHAIRS

Jon Yoder, PhD, Kent State University
Vahid Vahdat, PhD, Washington State University

Theories of atmosphere, when understood as affect, may sometimes focus on “transpersonal intensity,” while others stress “environment, or the transmission of the other’s feeling.” Still others account for atmosphere as “qualified aura,” “tone,” and “waves of sentiment” or, finally consider it “more broadly a sense of place.” A common thread among these definitions is a relational modality, for as atmospheres continually form and dissolve, manifest and disappear, they affect bodies and the bodies of things that enter into relation with one another. Always in the emergent process of transformation, they exceed the assemblage of the living bodies from which they emanate and traverse divisions between people, things, and spaces.

—Guiliana Bruno, Atmospheres of Projection (2022)

Architecture and film are famous for their affinities. For starters, both fields are incredibly complex. Buildings and films can both take years to complete, and their production teams sometimes consist of hundreds of people. Both fields also often focus on worldmaking. Indeed, the best buildings and films both routinely construct challenging new visual and spatial experiences and environments. Despite countless cross-disciplinary exchanges, however, scholarship on architecture and film has tended to operate in only two main areas: depictions of buildings and cities in films, and influences of filmic logics and techniques on the design of buildings.

2025 ARCHITECTURE & FILM SYMPOSIUM

Instead, this symposium solicits emerging research that explores notions of affect in architecture and film. Like other cultural spheres including fashion, food, and music, architecture and film are increasingly expected to elicit emotional and sensorial, affective responses. Ambient and atmospheric approaches abound. And the boundaries among aesthetics, politics, cultures, and technologies have never been blurrier in both fields. For this biennial event, symposium organizers define “affect” broadly. We seek a diverse range of cross-disciplinary paper submissions and session proposals that challenge traditional relationships between architecture and film. All voices are welcome, and researchers from all disciplines are encouraged to apply.

Of Affect invites paper proposals and experimental (short) film/video submissions on a wide range of topics in architecture and film, such as:

- Bodies, genders, and affect
- Ambient images and other post-linguistic paradigms
- Motions and emotions
- Atmospheres of color, light, and/or sound
- Artificial (affective) intelligences
- Sense and cinesthesia: post-phenomenological perceptions
- Urban and post-urban ambiances
- Affective utopias, dystopias, and/or heterotopias
- Empathy and other inter-subjective engagements
- Decolonizing the senses
- Screen-based reflections on surface finishes
- Magic hour: the beauty (and horror) of shadows
- Animating affect
- Science fictions and other speculative fabulations
- Realisms: dirty and/or speculative
- Synthetic landscapes
